The Curse of Young Men.
Many regard the use of tobacco as a harm.

Tobacco has often received the denunciations of those high in authority. The Russian government threatened with death a four-year-old girl the second time she

All chemists unite in pronouncing several of its principles deadly poisons, Nicotine, one of those principles, is such a rank poison that a single drop placed upon the tongue hundredth part of a grain pricked into the skin produces giddiness, nausea and fainting. These poisons penetrate every part of the system, impairing the natural taste and relish for food, lessening the appetite and weakening the stomach. It is a most powerful narcotic, producing the most debilitating effects unless continually indulged in. By it the nerves are enfeebled and the sensibilities par-

The appetite for it is created and not natural. This unnatural appetite frequently produces a desire for alcoholic liquor and leads to intemperance. Observation confirms the fact that nearly all the intemperate are addicted to the use of tobacco in some or other

In addition to these health reasons, there are other weighty ones against its use. It is an expensive habit. The young cannot afford it. It makes a large inroad upon their prospective savings. Ten cents a day ($36.50 a year) spent for tobacco, if deposited in the savings bank by a young man of twenty, would when he attained the age of sixty

Its use by young men often awakens suspicions, and prejudices some against them. A young man with a cigar in his mouth walked into the store of a merchant in this city, and applied for a situation that had been advertised. The proprietor, noticing his cigar, told him, at once, that he had no need of his services.

In view of all these things what is the part of wisdom in this matter. Is it not to shun the vile weed in all its forms? It will not make us "healthy, wealthy or wise," honored or permanently happy, but will impair our health, wealth and true happiness.
